A new study released today shows that male to female (MtF) transsexual women face a higher rate of unemployment than female to male (FtM) transsexuals (20 percent). "The study confirms the gendered employment landscape for MtF (male-to-female) and FtM (female-to-male) transsexual individuals," the researchers wrote in the paper. The results have important implications for public policy related to the employment of MtF transsexual people. While the unemployment rate is higher in MtF transsexual people, it is possible to be employed in jobs where the "personal information" of the person is protected. "It was noted," the researchers wrote, "that in some countries, employment was not protective, implying that in some instances work security has been compromised." Unemployment for MtF and FtM transsexual people face higher rates of homelessness than FtM transsexuals, and MtF have higher rates of substance abuse than FtM. The researchers cite research indicating that MtF transsexual people face "perceived gender incongruence" in their relationships with "significant others and institutions." Sylvia Rivera Law Project Executive Director Christopher Dore has this to say: "MtF transsexuals face the additional indignities of higher unemployment, more substance abuse, higher rates of homelessness and victimization, and increased isolation from discrimination and isolation than their FtM counterparts. The experience of this painful fact must be accounted for in the creation of public policy." The study was authored by Richard C. Friedman of the University of Pennsylvania and Mark W. Rosenblum of The University of Tennessee in Knoxville.
