Molecular dissection of the proapoptotic function of the hominoid Class C and Class D cyclophilin CypB. The regulatory effects of cyclophilin-mediated protein trafficking on apoptotic execution are poorly defined. To facilitate the analysis of the role of CypB in apoptosis, we generated Bax-V5-associated and untagged CypB constructs by recombinant adenovirus. CypB induced apoptosis in all types of transformed cells tested, including those that undergo apoptosis in response to anti-Fas or ceramide. Induction of apoptosis by CypB was associated with mitochondrial permeabilization and cytochrome c release, with similar kinetics to other pro-apoptotic stimuli. CypB induced apoptosis in a Bax-independent manner and by a mechanism distinct from that of Bax or BH3-only proteins. CypB-mediated apoptosis was partially inhibited by truncation mutants of Bax, indicating that distinct regions of Bax could be independently required for its induction of apoptosis and mitochondrial permeabilization. Molecular replacement experiments mapped the critical residues of CypB in the cyclophilin domain and the N-terminal peptide-binding groove to be essential for apoptosis induction. Partial replacement of the N-terminal peptide-binding groove with a short peptide mimicking the class D peptide-binding determinant of CypA blunted Bax-dependent apoptosis, suggesting the specific effects of CypA on Bax function in the cytosol in this context. Our results demonstrate a novel role for CypB as a potent proapoptotic stimulus, further supporting a critical role for CypB in apoptosis induction. Generalized synchrony in e79caf774b
