What's new in Shrouded Tales: Revenge Of Shadows Collector's Edition:

Australia Radar Warfare Australia was a military unit of the RAAF operating large- and medium-range radars during and after World War II. Designed by the Telecommunications Research Establishment (TRE) it provided early warning of bombers approaching Australia in the form of cooperation between the RAAF, UK, US and other Commonwealth air forces, radar-equipped ships, and Australian aircraft. This system worked by directing U.S. Navy and British air-to-surface radar stations to Japanese aircraft approaching the Malay Peninsula, enabling them to be intercepted with air-to-air fighters and bombers. The first set of radar stations was located at a range of from Darwin and Jane in northern Australia. These stations were manned by a small team of RAAF personnel operating the Avro Anson aircraft, and the US Navy was asked to supply a radar operator. These early stations covered a large area, approximately from their base in Cape Denison, 3,500 km from Darwin and the Hornet air base in Queensland — the largest organisation of radar stations during this time. Usually, stations were positioned 100 miles apart and each station used a different radar system with antennas of different sizes to cover a range of altitude a minimum of for operation over the continent. When large traffic was detected, RAAF and RAF aircraft were dispatched to perform an escort, close air patrol or bomber attack and radar picked up the bombers as they flew towards Darwin. Although early, the radar network was successful in detecting approaching bombers, capturing enough information to raise emergency signals to Air Raid Wardens and to enable some aircraft to be scrambled to intercept the bombers. Early stations used either Marconi piston aero-screw radars or Marconi Avro anechoic radio-navigational radars, which used a broad-beam set of transmitters and were sited on the transmitters roof. After the war, the RAAF, ARES, TRE and the Australian Bureau of Civil Aviation Safety (BCAS) established laboratories to improve the effectiveness of radar sensors. In the 1950s, the RAAF developed Mk. 509 radar sets, which covered the full Northern Territory and Western Australia, areas known to the Japanese where they would not reveal their approach, but had a smaller coverage over areas where the Japanese Air Force (JAF) would have been expected to operate. Origins In the 1930s, the RAAF had begun to develop an early warning radar. The first reports of the development of an early
